

EXERCISE 3.1.1B Me, Myself, and SocietyName: Alario S. Espino Section: A17Process Questions:

1. What beliefs, values, and behaviors do you consider to be helpful to your social self? Why?

The belief of karma, that whatever you do to someone would come back to you at least 3x better or worse. It gives me the idea that if I do something bad to someone it would also come back to me as something terrible. I also believe in the idea that people have an innate tendency to do good, that despite what happens they would choose to do something good over evil. It gives me the idea to respect people no matter their background. It also helps me understand more what I would do if I were in their shoes.

2. What beliefs, values, and behaviors do you consider as detrimental to your social self? Why?

My behavior of quick thinking is not really that helpful. Yes it is helpful for situations where reflexes or sticky situations is needed. But this could also lead to hasty judgements and these hasty judgements could affect how we see a person. The belief that there is an innate

Ability for one person to do good over evil can also be detrimental in a sense that we generalize people to only do good despite already on a long history of bad activities and fail to think for justice on the things they do.

3. What new insights about your social self do you have at this point?

A New Insight that I learned about my social self is the impact of society and your environment. The environment you grow on contributes greatly to how you would grow up. Having a toxic environment where there isn't really anyone listening to what you say would make you a very quiet person. Having a community that constantly raises dire problems without being given long term solutions would inspire you to become the problem solver. Another insight that I have learned would be the impact of culture to the social self. Having a commonly accepted culture within a group would force an individual to adapt into these cultures in order to join the group.

EXERCISE 3.2.1B MSM – My Social Media

Name: Alaric S. Espiña Section: ALT

Instructions: Take a look at the things you post on your social media accounts and answer the following questions.

Processing questions:

1. Based on the things you post, what can you say about your online persona?

I do not really post alot of things online, most of the things I post there were only for requirements. I guess its showing that it's not different with my personality offline. I believe that its not really a necessity to post on social media since if we want to say something to someone we must message them and not tag them or namecall them on post.

2. How do you feel about your posts?

It feels nostalgic, since most of my posts were only about requirements it reminds me about the stress I felt. It also reminded me that there was actually a time that I thought of such concepts. It also feels satisfying that these posts which are just memories of achievement and completing hard requirements.

3. Have you ever been involved in social media conflicts? If yes, explain how, and if no, explain your general feeling toward social media conflicts.

No I haven't been to any social media conflicts and for me it is just a very immature way of actually solving a problem.

For me if you wanna solve a problem you should meet up in real life and talk about it. Solving a problem by name calling them on social media and exposing some private information, which only makes it worse, would open other problems and endanger other people

4. What can you do to avoid social media conflicts in the future?

In order to avoid possible social media conflicts I think the most important thing to remember would be to think twice about things. Thinking twice or even more about things give us chances to understand the opposing opinion more and try to avoid conflict. It is possible that sometimes we would fail to understand the true sense of the opposing opinion therefore we must try and seek help from others. In doing so it is important not to pressure the person to become biased to your own opinion.
